door of the Assembly is not barred by any restrictions save in regard to residence and naturalisation. Australia is often referred to as a land of anomalies, and to suit this designation many instances are quoted—some fairly, and some without any basis of fact. It may be regarded as a political anomaly that while the name of an elector must be on an electoral roll, a constituency may choose for its member any naturalised Chinaman or Turk who has been wandering about the colony for five years.

Some of our English readers may desire to know what are the precise terms of the statute relating to this subject. The New Constitution Act, which came into operation in 1850, provided that the Legislative Assembly should be composed of members elected by the people. But its electoral provisions were repealed by the Electoral Act of 1858, which provides that the Assembly shall consist of eighty members, to be elected by the people.

The new Gold Fields Act has been withdrawn, very much to the satisfaction of the thinking portion of the mining community. It appeared to have been framed with a view to transfer every possible shilling from the pockets of the miners to those of the mining registrars, the new Act requiring that the most trivial matter in connection with either a quartz or alluvial result? In nine months afterwards, 299 10s. were paid for these debentures. Being defeated upon this question, the Government were obliged to give up the constitutional usage, have resigned, but they stuck to the office, and cared for nothing as long as they got their money. They then brought forward a Land Act, which was to do every man good, but which, if it had been carried, would have been the worst arrangement that could have been made. Mr. Robertson's party opposed this Act; but who stuck to the tail of the Martin Administration? Why, Mr. Nowlan. (Laughter.) Then came the financial scheme—the scheme that was to get the country out of debt, and which was the worst arrangement that could have been made. (Laughter.) The Robertson Government came into power. (Cheers.) But how was Mr. Robertson treated? He brought forward some of the best measures that could have been framed, when he was opposed by a factionist minority. (Laughter.) He was later treated in the same way. (Mr. Nowlan: No, I was not there.) Well, Mr. Nowlan ought to have been there, and have taken the side of the people against this factional minority. (Cheers.) If they allowed the Electoral Amendment Act to pass, the majority would have been able to return two members. (Mr. Nowlan: "No.") He said yes; he had seen the Act; the electors of the Williams were to have an extra member. Hexham and other districts were to be similarly treated. But in consequence of the opposition of the minority, the majority party, these things were not done, and ultimately the minority ruled the majority. But what had Sir James Martin gained by his appeal to the country? He had lost seven or eight of his best supporters, while the Robertson Government would have the majority of the members. (Laughter.) Mr. Robertson would have had a chance of going on with his measures. (A voice: "And get you a billet.") He wanted no billet. He would be very glad to see the price of the Crown lands lowered; and that should be done. (Laughter.) He would have no objection to the acreage being sold at a rate of 2s. 6d. per acre, or even at 2s. per acre. (Laughter.) He believed a change of this kind had been closed—the Church of England 24, and of Roman Catholic 6. He had opposed the Kohn and an independent manner with regard to the late Government. "A voice: "We will hunt you." Mr. Mullen then rose and said, "I have been elected an elector went on to make a little speech about the religious dissensions that had been imported into some of the elections. He (Mr. Nowlan) was glad allusion had been made to this subject. Strong feelings had been aroused and deep divisions had been made. He was very prejudicial to the interests of the country—(heavily heard.) Every person in the community, from the labourer to the Prime Minister, should exert his influence to check the display of that spirit of animosity. "The cry had been started by the magazines for the purpose of exciting the passions of the people, and should be given to it. Mr. Mullen had said that he (Mr. Nowlan) had never initiated any measure, and was an absolute dummy in the House; it was true he had not spoken much in the House, but he had been a very active and influential member of the House, expecting to find a number of gentlemen who would attend to the business of the country, but instead of that there was a parcel of men squabbling for place and power. His experience was that speeches in the House were very seldom of any use. He then made the speech of an introductor of a new measure, unless those promised to be a jolly row; that only those persons spoke who wanted to see their speeches reported at length, so that they might appear in the very next issue in the newspapers. He said that the time of the country was being frittered away, that the House did not get through the business at all, but set it aside week after week, month after month, and he determined to be no party to such a course. He determined to speak only when he had something to say. With regard to local matters the roads and bridges were in a much better state than they were before he was elected. "A voice: "So they ought to be." So they ought to be, so they ought to be. He had obtained the largest grants of money for the roads and bridges in the county, from Clonsilla town to Bynackfield, and he had got for them many roads and bridges which they required. All these requirements remember all their good acts, and forget their bad ones." It was clearly of opinion that the recent dissolution had for its object the promotion of the good of the country, and he also believed that similar strife would ensue as soon as the House meets. He would support no want of confidence motion, but would let the present Government hold office till they were forced to resign. He was not, however, Mr. Holt felt inclined to take the part of the squatter, so far as he thought it advisable; the depression of the pastoral interest was reflected upon all classes, the merchant of Sydney, equally with the farmer and the squatter, would be affected by the depression of the free selection Act, but thought selection should be continued within certain defined limits. The adoption of the Victorian system would be advisable in declaring large areas open for selection; and that would be the best way of giving the squatter a fair opportunity, and so on, without destroying the squatter's rights. He desired to see a reciprocal tariff entered into between the colonies; that was, a certain fixed rate of Customs duties chargeable by all the colonies, payable into a common fund, and the duties pro rata. It was an arrangement calculated much to the profit of the colonies, and would prevent the feeling between the colonies would disappear. The ad valorem duties were the fairest impost that could exist in any country, and the burthen would rest fairly upon the working men, but upon the landed proprietors it was not so. It was not advisable to adopt protection in the ordinary sense of the word, but protection by way of the payment of bounties would not be objectionable. It would not be a bad piece of Smith policy to give every man an addition of 2½ per cent. placed upon the duties which grew. This would encourage the growth of this cereal, and would be a preventive of the action of the monopolists. With regard to the debt of the colony it was estimated that further taxation must be imposed, and he thought that the Government had made an addition of 2½ per cent. placed upon them. He gave the present Government credit for having fairly attempted to retrench, though can disputes shows that we understand the inconveniences and dangers of this policy. However constituent period in which the laws have not yet run by the men of action, and soon they will be accepted by the masses of the 'colleagues' who put themselves at the head of the insurrection.

ON Monday the nomination of candidates for the representation of the Williams in the new Parliament

That the movement was very serious may be seen from the number of the insurgents. It had been prepared for a long time, and even announced, both in France and Spain. The Government was therefore not surprised at its outbreak. It was not, however, so much surprised at the fact that the Government seem to have consisted in not dividing his troops and always attacking with superior forces. Thus it was we saw him leave the insurrection master of Valencia for a whole week, and not take the offensive until after having conquered a number of troops sufficient to succeed by resistance. It was easy to foresee the issue of the struggle seeing that nowhere, neither at Saragossa, Barcelona, or any point in the Peninsula, the troops had shown disaffection, and the tragedy must necessarily end according to the classic rules of Spain, that is to say, by the triumph of the military regime.

As yet the conquerors have behaved with a certain moderation. Thus the Cortes, in the last sitting, contented themselves with stripping the Republic of their political rights, and with leaving them to the disposal of the ordinary courts. A motion for the purpose of casting blame on the Republican members who quitted the Chamber was rejected: they will have quite enough ostracism from their own party.

It is not, however, to be expected that the movement of Parliament took up arms; and what proves the considerable progress that Republican ideas have made in Spain is, that out of forty-nine provinces there were twenty-nine in which there were attempts at insurrection. The present party has not, however, as yet made a great mistake of conduct in appealing to arms, for it has lost in a week forces which it will require years to re-form. It has lost them uselessly, for, for a year Spain has been virtually a republic, and so long as the Republic is not completely pacified, it might have served everybody; and now the insurrection has brought back—as is always the case—the rule and regime of generals.

He will, however, engage only in knocking down sin-getting, the head of the devil into chancery, leting his right fly at iniquity, and his left at hardness of heart; thus keeping the ring against all evil doers, and sending sinners generally to grass. It is pleasant to read of this beautiful ending of an ill-spent life; and for a retired pugilist it is decidedly more creditable than the usual resource of opening a liquor shop, keeping a gambling saloon, or becoming a demagogal Congressman.—New York Tribune.
